Dividend yield beats bond yield

The share price performance in emerging Europe, i.e. Poland, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Russia, Turkey, and since most recently again, Greece, has not been overwhelming in the past years. Since the middle of 2011 the MSCI Emerging Europe, the most important index for the region, had been locked into a sideways movement, which was topped off by a correction at the end of 2014 as a result of the ongoing political crises. Along with (geo-) political factors, the weakening of the economic dynamics and a lack of reforms had been causing a subdued price performance.

Whereas the performance leaves a lot to be desired, the central European and Russian equity markets are topping the ranks when it comes to dividends. In the past ten years the dividend yield has increased from a modest 2% or below 3% to sometimes more than 6%, i.e. more than in other emerging markets, and significantly more than in developed markets.

Especially in central Europe equity valuations have improved massively vis-à-vis bonds due to the decline in interest rates. The ratio of bond yield to earnings yield – a traditional valuation ratio for equity markets, also known as BEER – is at a record low in the three central European markets.

As a result of the more aggressive dividend policy, dividend yields have become very attractive in comparison with the current bond yields. The dividend yields in the Czech Republic and Poland had already been above bond yields for a while, and since very recently, this has also been the case in Hungary. In summary, dividend yields beat bond yields – which compensates for the prolonged unspectacular sideways movement of share prices.
